

The Plays of William Shakespeare (Classic Reprint)

Dr. Johnson's admirable plan of illustrating Shakespeare by the study of writers of his own time. By following this track, most of the difficulties of the author have been overcome, his Gibbon the historian. From this seminary he removed in IT S3 to King's College, Cambridge, and entered there under the tuition of the Reverend Dr. Barford. After staying a few years at the University, he left it without taking a degree, and accepted a commission in the Essex Militia, in which service he continued a few years longer. In 1763 he lost his father, from whom he inherited an ample property, which if he did not lessen he certainly did not increase. From this period he seems to have determined on the course of his future life, and devoted himself to literary pursuits, which he followed with unabated vigour, but without any lucrative views, as he never required, or accepted, the slightest pecuniary recompence for his labours. His first residence was in the Temple, afterwards at Hampton, and lastly at Hampstead, where he continued near thirty years. In this retreat his life passed in one unbroken tenor, with scarce any variation, except an occasional visit to Cambridge, walking to London in the morning, six days out of seven, for the sake of health and conversation, and returning home in the afternoon of the same day. By temperance and exercise he continued healthy and active until the last two years of his life, and to the conclusion of it did not relax his attention to the illustration of Shakespeare, which was the first object of his regard. He died the 22d or January, 1800, and was buried in Poplar-chapel, To the eulogium contained in the following epitaph by Mr. Hayley, which differs in some respects from that inscribed on the monument in Poplar chapel, those who really knew Mr. StC Yens will readily subscribe Peace to these ashes! once the bright attire MO fS tsev(Typographical errors above are due to
