

The House on Crystal Lake

Val and Sierra head for the lake house they just inherited from an ancient grandfather they never knew, taking along their cousin Elizabeth and best friends, identical twins Kiko and Mai. Also with them, having invited herself along, is an old friend to whom Val owes a debt of gratitude, and to whom she cannot say no. The plan is to spend a leisurely, indulgent summer of swimming, sunning, boating and picnicking, but Delia, the one who's grown away from Val and doesn't seem to know it, appears to have a surprise in mind for the other girls--it's written all over her face. When the other girls try to get her to come clean she pretends total innocence, but they can see right through that. They thought that by knowing she was going to do something, they would be prepared, but they were wrong. When the moment comes and no one has her guard up, Delia springs her surprise and the girls nearly have heart attacks. But that night someone disappeared, and the next day so did Delia. And the creepy villagers, who looked alarmingly alike, said they would send the sheriff. But when the sheriff came, looking like the villagers, he left no tire tracks in the mud, no muddy footprints on the floor. But if the girls thought they were getting freaked out now, all they had to do was wait a while. Because there was much, much worse to come.
